Research Supervision	While at Cardiff University, I have successfully supervised eleven Ph.D. students from Malta, Germany, Switzerland and Britain. Before leaving for SJTU, I was supervising four full-time and one part-time students from several countries (UK, United States, Syria, Canada) on a range of literary, critical and cultural topics: Lewis Carroll and metaphysical realism; gender stereotypes and tropes of female power in video games; a taxonomy of narratives via Grant Morrison's comic books; a critical history of the concept of literariness; contemporary 'post-projective' poetics (creative and critical work). I usually supervised an average of two M.A. dissertations per academic year and I have also acted as internal examiner to six Ph.D. dissertations.
Appointments as External Examiner (PG degrees, PhDs, etc.)	In China, I have taken on one doctoral student at SJTU, working on animal narratology. Teaching	Present Departmental Responsibilities and Profile Teaching undertaken at SJTU includes: MA in English Literature Digital Theory This innovative course explores a cluster of interrelated concepts, theories and practices which underpin our contemporary, technologized and globalized world and culture, focusing especially on virtuality, in its complex connections to 'reality', and digitality, and how it can be related to as well as distinguished from hapticity and the analogue. It endeavours to relate several critical-theoretical, philosophical constructions to some of the technologies and aesthetic forms (such as the internet and videogames) which have reshaped today's universe, especially in connection with their impact on society, community, identity and subjectivity. Through its broad inter-disciplinary framework, which ranges across art, technology, philosophy, politics, economics and game studies, and using representative films and videogames as 'test cases', the course attempts to outline and distinguish a more versatile 'Digital Theory' from the more media studies-oriented, often less theorized field of Digital Culture.
